SPEND MONEY, GET HAPPY!

More than a decade of research has been investigating how different types of purchases affect our well-being. The key, it seems, is to spend money in ways that bring you closer to other people. More than 1,500 participants in a study tended to say that experiential purchases made them happier and were better investments.

Researchers typically define experiences as things we buy in order to do something, which don't endure in the form of a possession; and material goods as things we buy in order to have something.
